Still Worried Over Soviet Missile
Removals from Cuba

Editor of The Press: International communism now has a firm grip in this hemisphere. Are we protecting the Russians in Cuba with our airforce and navy? Are the Soviets building a naval base at Banes, Cuba? And how about the $300 million worth of Soviet arms Castro has received since last November?

Harper's Magazine, April, 1963, presents a book-length supplement, "The Craft of Intelligence," by Allen Dulles, former director of the Central Intelligence Agency, in which he shows a photograph of a U. S. destroyer checking cargo on a Soviet freighter pulling away with an uncoveted missile-like object.

What is certain or definite about a missile-like object? And even if the offensive missiles had been pulled out of Cuba, what is to keep them from returning?

Last October, President Kennedy promised on-the-spot inspection of the Soviet arm build-up in Cuba, and Khrushchev agreed. Anything short of an on-the-spot inspection is not only doom to this nation, but to what is left of the entire free world.

It is no wonder we look so weak in the eyes of other nations, and that they plan for their own defense. Must we continue to bow and scrape ourselves to these Communists until there is no alternative?

We know that Khrushchev has never kept a single promise, and we also know that the Communist goal is world domination. I am not afraid of a nuclear war, but I am deathly afraid of communism.
